EDUCATION

Catholic teachers soon in a strike position

Teachers in Ontario's Catholic schools will be in a legal strike position by mid-August.

In April, members of the Ontario English Catholic Teachers' Association (OECTA), which represents teachers in the province's publicly funded Catholic elementary and secondary schools, voted in favour of a strike if contract talks with the government and association representing school boards did not improve.

Talks continued with the aid of a mediator, but on June 24 the union filed for conciliation. This step towards legal strike action was followed by a request for a "no board report."

OECTA will be in a legal strike position 17 days after the "no board" report is issued, likely by mid-August.

These latest developments in what has proven to be a difficult round of negotiations does not bode well for the start of the school year next fall.

The union is accusing the Ontario Catholic School Trustees' Association, which is speaking for school boards at the bargaining table, and the Liberal government of trying to strip existing collective agreements.

"Our members are standing up for what's right for the education system, principles the employer does not seem to be taking seriously," said OECTA president Ann Hawkins.

The outlook for teachers in the province's public schools does not look any better.
