

LHIN releases new integrated health service plan

The Mississauga Halton Local Health Integration Network (LHIN) recently identified access, capacity and quality as three “strategic priorities” to improve the overall health of residents.

The findings are part of the local LHIN’s recently released 2016-19 Integrated Health Service Plan: Partnering for a Healthy Community.

“We are energized by the direction in which we are heading,” said Graeme Goebelle, Mississauga Halton LHIN board chair.

“The plan represents the voices of our citizens and identifies what is needed to build a stronger system of care that focuses on the needs of the diverse people living in our community.”

Through various engagements, LHIN staff heard from those who provide and receive care in the Mississauga Halton LHIN.

“Partnering for a healthy community represents what is most important to people — getting the care they need when they need it; ensuring resources are available, now and in the future; and having a good care

Halton LHIN for the next three years are, ensuring:

- access to health care is there when and where it’s needed;
- the capacity for required resources now and in the future; experience and positive outcomes when they use the health care system,” stated a media release.

The three priorities identified by the Mississauga sources now and in the future;

- quality — positive experiences and outcomes from patients.

“As the health-care system continues to evolve, we remain pivotal in health system transformation and are committed to putting people and patients first by improving the health-care experience,” said Bill MacLeod, Mississauga Halton LHIN CEO.

“We continue to monitor our progress and be flexible in our approach to meet the changing needs of our residents.”
