Environment Canada is warning of the potential for a high-impact winter storm to hit Southern Ontario Friday.

High-impact winter storm could slam Georgetown Friday

The weather as of late has been indicating that spring is on the way, but according to the Weather Network, residents of southern Ontario should not get their hopes up just yet.

Forecasters are warning of the possibility of a high-impact winter storm hammering southern Ontario by early Friday morning, due to patterns of atmospheric blocking seen in the North Atlantic Ocean.

Rain is expected across the region on Thursday, which may transition into snow by Friday.

The U.S. National Weather Service of Buffalo is calling the patterns 'untrustworthy,' and says that depending on thermodynamics, there is the possibility of the region seeing more than 20 centimetres of wet snow, but there could also be as little as a few centimetres.
