New face in the race: meet Kim Roy

First time municipal candidate running for Ward 4

Kim Roy is running for Ward 4 councillor with the town of Halton Hills.

Lifelong Georgetown resident Kim Roy is throwing her hat in the ring to become a councillor for Halton Hills.

Roy will be running against current Coun. Bob Inglis as well as Ron Norris in what's set to be a hotly contested ward in the upcoming election.

"Being a project manager, I'm representing various stakeholders," said Roy, who works to lead and solve problems in her role at a tech company. "The constituents of my ward are my stakeholders."

She says that her lifelong experiences give her valuable assets to help lead the town, because she works every day to bring people together, balance their issues all with a common goal in mind.

"What I'm looking forward to is speaking directly to people in my ward," she said, adding that she hopes to hear their concerns and keep the community engaged with local government.

"What I stand behind is remaining small town strong," she said. "Watching all this growth ... what I remain passionate about is keeping that small-town feel." Roy says that she's always wanted to run for council, and with her daughter fully grown and graduated university, now feel like the right time.

In her daily life, she commutes to Toronto by GO train for work and says that she understands the challenges commuters face in the town, adding that she would like to work on increasing transit opportunities in Halton Hills, as well as advocate for extended GO service.

Talking to friends and neighbours in town, Roy is getting a feel for the key issues that people feel passionate about, and the gaps in knowledge about municipal government.

"To me, my heart will always be on the side of the people," she said. "Being that mode of communication between residents and the municipality."

In her spare time, Roy curls competitively and enjoys taking part in triathlons.
