Simply Local: Your guide to Halton farms

There are many benefits to buying local produce – it benefits the environment, supports the local agricultural economy, and simply tastes great. One of the ways Halton supports the local agricultural community is making it easy for residents to connect with local farmers and agri-businesses. Halton's Simply Local online map is your best source to find up to date information on local farms, farmers markets, where to pick-your-own produce and fun activities for all ages.

To use the map and learn more about local farms, visit halton.ca or download the OneHalton app.

'IT'S NOT JUST A MUSIC LESSON': PIANO AND VOICE TEACHER HARMONIZES INTO WILLIAMS MILL

VERONICA APPIA

Danielle Dixon first began teaching piano and voice as a way to make an income while completing her degree and pursuing a career in the music industry.

What she didn't know at the time was how it would change her life.

"I was looking for something in the music industry that was kind of related, just to have an income to start out with," she said. "I ended up teaching and was not prepared for how much I was going to love it."

Now, Dixon has decided to pursue teaching on her own and has fallen in love with something else: Her studio space at Williams Mill in Glen Williams.

"I just love the artistic energy. I know that I can work well there and that it will inspire students. The space was just perfect for starting out," she said.

Dixon's new school, The Main Conservatory of Music Inc., is now open for business and classes are available for registration for the fall season.

Danielle Dixon, owner and music teacher at The Main Conservatory of Music at Williams Mill, instructs Milly Tseng during her open house on Aug. 4, 2018.

Dixon says her educational background at Berklee College of Music and the Royal Conservatory of Music, as well as her experience as a professional singer-songwriter, allows her to be able to aid her students in a variety of avenues from exams, to performance, to auditions.

And when it comes to her students, Dixon says she not only enjoys seeing their progress, but also the ways in which they develop over time.

"I've done lots of research with music therapy and development and how much it helps behind the scenes with education, working on the different sides of the brain to help with stimulation, focus and creativity," she added. "There's so many amazing things that music does. Not only the creative side, but the development side too, which is pretty cool."

She says with The Main Conservatory of Music Inc., she aims to create a family environment, where she is able to get to know her students well and tailor the lessons specifically to their learning style.

"I get so excited to get into the studio to teach and I absolutely love spending that time with my students and one of the reasons is because I have that one-on-one time," Dixon added. "It's not just a music lesson. I really want to create an environment where it's a family."
