

SHOOTING RANGE DESIGN TARGETS HIGH-TECH TRAINING TOOLS

HRPS tactical officers, from left, Jessie Martin and Lance Broderick make use of the service's new firing range with their carbine C8 semi-automatic rifles. The firing range in the new police headquarters facility, which opens to the public Sept. 24, can accommodate a variety of firearms, including pistols and rifles.

Trainees in the new Halton police shooting range might feel like they're on a dark highway one day and at a noisy summer festival the next, thanks to a swath of high-tech features meant to teach officers how to better use their guns.

The new shooting range comes as part of the Halton Regional Police Service's new headquarters, opening to the public on Sept. 24 on the same Bronte Road property as the old building. The $65-million building replaces the one constructed in 1991, and will include a shooting range double the size of its predecessor, with a host of new features meant to give officers more varied weapons training.
