The Halton Regional Police Service has a new deputy chief.

Deputy Chief Jeff Hill was sworn into the new role on Wednesday, Oct. 16 during a ceremony at the Burlington Convention Centre.

"It's surreal," said Hill in an interview prior to the ceremony.

"When you start this job, this is not where you picture yourself at all. It's just humbling to know I am going to get to work with the more than 1,000 (police) members that are here and be able to influence a lot of the positive contributions that I want to see with regard to mental wellness and violence against women and the programming there, and internal inclusivity. It's just an incredible honour and I can't wait to get going on it."

Hill's promotion follows the departure of Halton police deputy chief Nishan Duraipappah, who left to take on the role of Peel chief of police on Oct. 1.

Hill began his career with Toronto Police in 1997 where he served as a court officer and a parking enforcement officer.

In December of 1998, he joined Halton police and was assigned to uniformed patrol in Oakville.

He later served as a patrol officer in Burlington and then transitioned into the criminal investigations bureau in 2006.

Hill rose through the ranks, eventually being promoted to inspector and placed in the role of commander of human resources.

He then became superintendent for regional investigative services, which includes the homicide unit, domestic violence unit, the child abuse and sexual as-
