

LIBRARY 3D PRINTING FACE SHIELD PARTS

BRYAN MYERS

Though the Halton Hills Public Library has been closed for over a month, staff have been using the facilities to pitch in where they can. Following an open call for assistance from a Waterloo-based 3D printer sales company, the library started 3D printing parts of face shields to be donated to front-line health workers.

Now, whenever a staff member is at the library, parts for the shield are being printed, though King couldn't say how many parts have been printed or shipped, or how long it takes to print.

Inksmith, based in Waterloo, released designs for two types of face shield for front-line workers, that, while pending Health Canada approval, are being provided to hospitals and health-care providers in need.
