WEEKLY ROUNDUP: PROVINCE RECONSIDERS VACCINE PASSPORTS

HERB GARBUETT

After resisting implementing COVID-19 vaccine passports in Ontario, the provincial government is said to be reconsidering.

Numerous medical officers of health across the province have been calling for the province to introduce some sort of passport system, with some suggesting they will create their own if the province doesn't.

An increasing number of employers are requiring proof of vaccination, and many venues have begun mandating vaccinations to gain entry into larger events.

COVID-19 cases have continued to rise across the province. The seven-day average for new cases increased for 22 straight days, rising from 198 on Aug. 5 to more than three times that, 665 on Aug. 27.

In Halton, there were 139 new cases from Aug. 20-26, two more than the previous week. Case totals started to reverse the provincial trend midway through the week. The region had three straight days with fewer than 20 cases from Aug. 24-26, lowering the seven-day average from 22.3 to 19.9.

The number of active cases in the region still rose slightly to 127, up six from the previous week. That included 49 in Burlington, 33 in Oakville, 37 in Milton and eight in Halton Hills.
