POOR HUMAN BEHAVIOUR IMPACTING BRUCE TRAIL

TRAIL AMBASSADORS HIRED FOR VISITOR OUTREACH

The Bruce Trail Conservancy has hired six Trail Ambassadors to perform visitor outreach and litter clean-ups in three regions, including Hamilton/Halton.

As more people seek the physical and mental benefits of walking in nature, some areas of the Niagara Escarpment have become hotspots, seeing more human-caused impact than the environment can handle, according to a press release issued by the organization.

"The high volumes of trail users include those who may not be familiar with trail etiquette. Litter, trespassing, and other poor behaviours are impacting the trail, the environment, other trail users, and landowners whose property the Bruce Trail crosses."

Together with Bruce Trail Club volunteers, the summer staff will visit busy trail destinations to promote leave no trace practices and safe trail use. They'll also be distributing Hike it. Love it. Keep it Clean badges to those who join them in picking up litter or who are demonstrating low impact hiking.

To encourage safe and responsible hiking, the Bruce Trail Conservancy has also created some helpful online tips: <https://bruce-trail.org/pages/hiking-safely-responsibly>

"More people using the Bruce Trail is not a bad thing, in itself. It is wonderful that people have discovered the Bruce Trail as a way to connect with nature" explains Adam Brylowski, manager of conservation and trail. "For these trails and protected areas to continue to thrive, the Bruce Trail Conservancy, its partners, and all its supporters must work together to ensure that the cumulative impact of all our visits is minimized".
