NEWS

WEEKLY ROUNDUP: OMICRON MAY HAVE PEAKED, SAY OFFICIALS

BAMBANG SADEWO
bsadewo@metroland.com

The worst of Omicron may be behind us.

That's according to government officials at a virtual news conference on Friday, Jan. 28.

"Although daily reported cases remain at record high levels and continue to underestimate the true number of infections, multiple indicators suggest infections have peaked at national level, including daily case counts and test positivity ..." Dr. Theresa Tam, Canada's chief public health officer, said in the update.

As of Jan. 26, the seven-day average case count of more than 19,000 cases reported daily is a 28 per cent decrease compared to the previous week, she said.

"This reassures us that individual efforts, including the layering of personal protection like masking and limiting in-person contacts together with population based public health measures to reduce contact rates are helping to slow transmission and mitigate severe illness trends."

As for COVID-19 hospitalizations, there were 85 people being treated in Halton hospitals as of Friday, Jan. 21, with 18 in intensive care — compared to 129 and 21, respectively, from the previous week.

The week also saw 15 more people die from COVID-19 — eight in Oakville, four in Burlington, three in Oakville, and three in Milton, bringing the death toll to 291.
