service, or how accessible Halton health services are to women. The emphasis is on finding ways to improve the Halton system and close any gaps.

"I've been here 12 years [in Halton Hills] and I've never used any services in Halton," commented one woman in attendance. She argued that her health care needs are better met in Toronto.

The meeting identified key points that Georgetown and area women are concerned with. Among them, are dignity, privacy, a variety of childbirth options that empowers the mother rather than the doctor, caregiver support, confidence in local services and accessibility.

The forum ended by Sanders asking women to consider a system in which both consumers and providers are responsible for making sure services are used. The group addressed a need for women in general to be more assertive in questioning their medical diagnoses and seeking alternatives when desired/needed.

One of the strongest proposals that emerged during the evening was for medical advice/support for simple condition.

The Acton meeting will take place Wednesday, Nov. 25 in the Acton High School cafeteria from 7 to 9 p.m. Registration is not required. All locations are accessible to the physically disabled. For further information or to express a concern, call the Women's Health Study Steering Committee at 842-2120 or toll-free at Zenith #40340.
