The Heirloom Gown

Many fabrics have a natural tendency to yellow with age. Sometimes this type of yellowing can be overcome if the gown can be carefully wetcleaned and gently bleached. This is not always possible, however, depending on the type of fabric, the trim, and the age and condition of the garment. Your drycleaner must evaluate each case individually.

Even if an heirloom gown has been damaged by time, it can often be restored by a style alteration that hides permanently set stains or by the replacement of trim that has discolored or become shabby looking.

If your heirloom gown has become damaged or discolored, or if your own gown becomes yellow with age, consult with your International Fabricare Institute drycleaner. He or she understands restoration problems with delicate and antique materials and can tell you whether restoration is possible.

Over The Years

Even after your gown is carefully stored, inspect it again from time to time. Stains that didn't show up at the time of cleaning could appear later, and should be attended to at once. An occasional inspection will assure you that your gown is not becoming damp or suffering from heat exposure.

Your wedding gown. It is worth the concern and attention you give to its selection and care, both before the wedding and afterwards.
