McCauley nixes integration

By Rosaleen Garneau
Special

Irene McCauley of Georgetown, chair of the Halton Roman Catholic School Board, said trustee Margaret Bullock's suggestion to integrate the catholic and public school boards was "like flogging a dead horse".

The catholic board has a constitutional right to existence under the British North America Act, she said. It has been reviewed by the supreme court and has been declared a dead issue.

McCauley pointed out the difference between the boards is not just religion as a teaching subject, but a faith mission extending from trustees to teachers to students.

She also indicated the public and catholic boards have a history of cooperation in Halton, have always understood taxpayers' concerns and have worked together to save costs.

Dave Cook, Minister of Education has stated integration of the two systems is not in the government's agenda. However, he has suggested amalgamation of Ottawa and Carleton County catholic boards and Ottawa and Carleton public boards. The same thing is being tried with the London and Essex school boards.

McCauley pointed out, it is a joining of separate to separate, public to public being tried, not separate to public as suggested by Bullock.
