ASSIC alert

If you divorced or separated after January 1, 1987, you may be entitled to divide Canada Pension Plan (CPP) credits equally with your former legal or common-law spouse. CPP credits are based on the contributions made by each worker. Built up over the years, these credits are used to figure out the amount of future CPP benefits. Both spouses earn CPP credits while living together, even if one was not in the paid labor force.

Consequently, the plan allows for equal splitting of credits. This could enable you to qualify for certain CPP benefits or increase the amount of benefit you may receive.

Spouses must have lived together for 12 consecutive months. In the case of marriages that have ended, there is no time limit to initiating credit splitting. With regard to separation, the spouses must be separated for at least 12 months prior to applying and for common-law spouses, applications must be made within four years of the separation date. In the event of a death of a spouse there may be certain time restrictions to applying. Call for details.

All necessary information needs to be provided to Health and Welfare Canada. To find out more about credit splitting or to apply, call the Health and Welfare Office's Income Security Program. From a 416 area code, call 1-800-265-9480. Residents calling from a 519 area code can call 1-800-263-8391.
