Made in America lives up to advance billing

By Lawson Oates and Dawn Wood

Made in America, starring Ted Danson and Whoopi Goldberg, is destined to do well at the box office. With Danson's massive media exposure over the final episode of Cheers and Goldberg's very successful 1992 lead role in the popular Sister Act, Made in

Movie Review

America will draw large audiences. Fortunately, the movie lives up to its advanced billing.

The plot has 17-year old Zora Mathews (played by Nia Long) discovering that her mother, Sarah (Whoopi Goldberg), was artificially inseminated. Sarah is the owner/operator of an African-American bookstore and a self-identified "urban bush woman". When she tracks down her father, Zora discovers that it is Hal Jackson (Ted Danson), a local car salesman who fosters an urban cowboy persona using various animals to promote his car sales.

Confused by this startling revelation, Sarah draws her mother into her discovery. Sarah reacts with anger and astonishment. In short order a three-way triangle is established as roles are re-examined and redefined and popular notions of what a family is are put on trial.

Danson, playing the role of "Pal Hal" Jackson, has some hilarious moments. His attempts to shoot commercials with various members of the wild kingdom turn into some major slapstick. His encounter with a "trained" bear is one of the funniest scenes to be seen in years. Goldberg, by contrast, does not draw the big laughs. Rather, she provides the pillar to the movie around which other actors are able to draw out the movie's comedy. This, in contrast to her roles in Sister Act and Ghost, where she played the lead comic role.

A welcome addition to the movie's cast is Will Smith, who viewers will recognize from NBC's Fresh Prince of Bel-Air. His comedy is slick and fast paced, contrasting well with Danson's measured delivery. Director Richard Benjamin does a credible job in bringing out the diverse comic capabilities of these two actors.

P.S. Bicycle riders will cringe at the negative publicity Sarah Mathews brings to the cause of urban bicycling. Watch for Jackson's gesture to bring some sense to her kamikaze display.
