THE LOST

We were just discussing the way our granddaughter, Kelly, is growing up. Quite remarkable, really. Grandparents discuss that type of thing all the time. Kelly is losing her baby teeth - I believe the latest count is three. I'm certain these teeth are not lost. No doubt, they are stowed away most securely, likely accompanied by all the monies deposited by the Tooth Fairy.

So many things that we say are "lost" are not lost at all. Why, I lost a whole city one time - Memphis I believe it was - but I found Atlanta. Merely took the wrong lane off the expressway.

Some losses are terrible. I lost my appendix, then my tonsils and finally, much of my hair. I often wonder if the loss of my tonsils and hair could have ruined a promising operatic career. Not likely! Speaking of the appendix, I recall the young guys I knocked around with saying that you did not get married to a young lady who still had her appendix and furthermore, she had to possess a fur coat. They considered these to be expense items better absorbed by the young lady's father. Funny guys! Pat and I worked out a deal on the basis that though she still had her appendix, she did have two fur coats.

But getting back to loosing silly things, an old friend of mine lost his car in Toronto the night of the Grey Cup game, one year. That might be a slight understatement - he actually lost the parking lot where his car was parked. And he was fast approaching loosing the whole city!

I understand that there is a large group of people, who are so conscious of losing things, that they tuck things away so securely that they can never find them. I understand further that there is no name for this affliction, though when it happens to me I refer to it as my "idiot syndrome".

Many people use the term "lost" to explain why they don't have some particular thing. They lost a chance to get something or other. They bet on five races and lost all five. Maybe it has a softer sound than saying "not winning".

It's impossible to consider anything lost without considering win at the same time. There are certain lost-won equations which are referred to all the time. How about the most recent story of the Toronto Maple Leafs. They lost a chance to play for the Stanley Cup - but they won the best wishes of hockey fans all over the country. Maybe they lost the battle, but they won the war.

Just think of every wedding reception you have attended. Invariably someone will say - "Don't feel that you have lost a son/ daughter - you have gained a daughter/son." Great comments - and then everyone cries!

In business and financial career summation, you will often read that someone lost a fortune but was in good health. Or someone lost their health but were worth a fortune.

But I will have to bring this to an end. I have lost my train of thought and I have apparently misplaced my pen!
