THE SHOES

Pat has suggested, recently, that I should throw out my old suede shoes. As a matter of fact, she has threatened to throw them out when I am not looking. Of a necessity, I have had to find a new place to hide them.

I guess she is right. They look quite shabby. The actual suede finish is long gone. They are no longer the light beige color I was so pleased with when I bought them. They are the loafer type and quite a bit of the stitching is long gone. The right one has a bad tear down the outside of the shoe - like down to the sole. Pat exaggerates when she says my right little toe sticks out of the tear - only my sock sticks out!

The heels are worn on the outside corners, and when they are sitting in the closet, they have the appearance of two sinking ships.

But how would I ever replace the comfort! My feet really relax every time I put on those shoes. There is a certain feeling of security and familiarity every time I put them on. I have only experienced this feeling once before and that was with a pair of light beige pants - maybe it's the color that gets me. Anyway, Pat held the winning hand on the pants.

She refused to repair them any more and it was impossible for me to wear them in view of the location of the split seams.

But the shoes are different. Who cares about an exposed toe?

I have no idea how long I have had these shoes. When I think where they have trod, it would be criminal to throw them away. They walked the sands of English Bay and the rock of Grouse Mountain on a weekend in Vancouver. They strutted the streets around Hollywood and Vine in Los Angeles on a business/holiday. They have marched the malls of Florida. They have sauntered the beaches of Maine on various excursions.

As they grew older, they struggled with lawn mowing, digging, gardening and painting. To think that these aristocrats of footwear have been brought to such a level. The cruelty of it all.

Considering that my toe gets wet when I wear them in the rain, it is obvious that I will have to negotiate some kind of settlement with Pat. Now let me see - I guess it would be too costly to have them bronzed. Maybe I could agree to "retire" these shoes - but throw them out - never!

It is just possible this concession on my part will get Pat to buy me a new pair.

What do you mean - people don't wear blue suede shoes anymore?
