

Bennett sent to minors

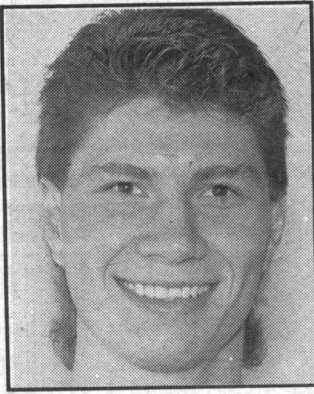

By Mike Zrostek

Georgetown's Adam Bennett received some bad news this week at the Chicago Blackhawks main NHL training camp. He was told that he had been sent down to the Indianapolis Ice of the International Hockey League.

Attempts to contact Bennett were unsuccessful, but Adam's father Keith, said his son was disappointed by this turn of events.

"He's very disappointed, they (Blackhawks management) told him this spring they were going with a youth movement and this fall they didn't tell Adam anything," Keith Bennett said.

In conversations with Adam this past summer, he seemed certain this would be his year to stick with the Hawks, especially after Chicago got swept in the opening round of the NHL playoffs by St. Louis Blues.

"If they give me a shot at making the team I feel with my abilities I can stick with Chicago for the whole year. I've worked out hard all summer and I feel I'm ready," said Bennett in late August.

The talk was the Blackhawks would be going to a youth movement with players such as Steve Larmer, Keith Brown and Michel Goulet on the way out.

This hasn't happened as yet, even with the NHL season just a little over a week away and teams getting ready to solidify their line-ups for this weekend's waiver draft.

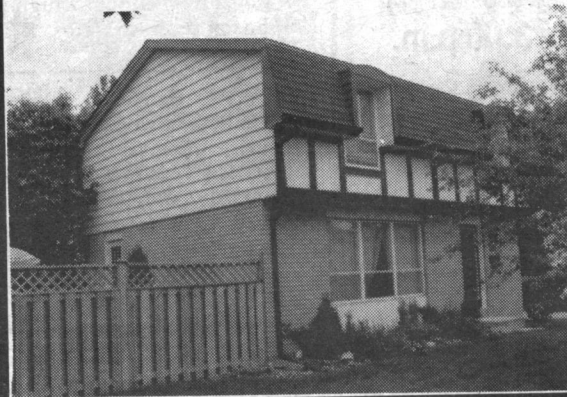

Chicago is definitely getting long in the tooth on defense with aging players like Craig Muni, 31 and Keith Brown, 33 along with still capable veterans Chris Chelios, 31 (who's having contract problems) and Steve Smith, 30.

"Adam worked out very hard this spring and thought he would stay this year," said Keith. "I don't know how long it will be for or if he will be back up, but right now he's going to play for Indianapolis and see how it goes."
