A Halloween to forget

By Eileen Ross

The crunching of autumn leaves neath the feet, followed by high pitched shrieks reverberated down the dark street. Halloween creatures of every description raced randomly up and down driveways swinging bulging sacks.

"Traditionally, Halloween is viewed as a child's night, but that's not necessarily true. It belongs to the night creatures. Creatures so hideously deformed, and uncontrollably violent, their degree of malformation is only outdone by the terror they inflict. Many children walk the streets on Halloween feeling perfectly safe, when in fact they are not. They are just what the night creatures are preying on.

The most ironic part of the whole nightmare is that you can't distinguish a child from these creatures. The kid dressed up as the disfigured guy with a hatchet who passed you on the street, or the woman dressed as a witch four doors down. They're everyone and no one."

"Wow!" said Trevor, as he flipped through his horror magazine - 'Nightmare Digest' "I never knew there were such a things as night creatures." He looked around warily as a couple of teenagers dressed up as the grim reaper and victim walked by.

"Hey, Trevor, wait up!"

Trevor snapped out of his reverie and looked up to see his friend Adam step off someone's porch. He caught up with him and the two continued down the street. "Where's Matthew?" Trevor asked. "I don't know," replied Adam. "He stopped to tie his shoe and the next thing I knew he was gone. I thought he was with you."
