

Rae hopes relationship with feds will improve

Now that the federal election is over, Norma Peterson has returned to my office and to her responsibilities as my Executive Assistant. She carried out her role as NDP candidate for Halton-Peel with the same dedication and good humor that she displays toward her work and I'm proud to have been involved in her campaign.

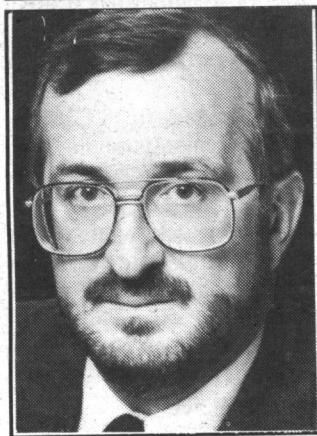

The unequivocal and sweeping rejection last week of the Conservative government by the Canadian people has been the subject of discussion and debate for many days. In Halton-Peel, as in the rest of the country, voters made it clear their priority was to defeat the Tory corporate agenda. And obviously they felt the Liberals had the best chance of succeeding.

Ontario suffered nine years of neglect and discrimination under the Tory government. We're looking forward to the end of that discrimination, and to working with the new government to focus on jobs and the economy. Ontarians have made it clear that they expect a fairer deal for Ontario.

The Premier praised the performance of Audrey McLaughlin, saying she "acted consistently with grace, with courage, with determination and with great eloquence." He saluted the efforts of the other MPs and pledged his commitment to working with McLaughlin and her team on the renewal of the NDP.

The Premier has already spoken to Prime Minister-Elect Jean Chretien and expressed his desire to work together on jobs and the economy in Ontario. Rae said he expects to have a meeting with Chretien within the next few days.

The Ontario government will work to ensure the new federal government keeps its promises to Ontario, and focuses on these priorities.

Ontarians have made it clear that they expect a fairer deal for Ontario and the provincial government will work to ensure the federal Liberals pay attention to what they promised during the election campaign.

Premier Rae has said that although national unity is important, the key issues for Ontarians and for this government are jobs and the economy and that is what he will pursue when he meets Mr. Chretien.

EATING WITH DENTURES
 It will take practice to learn to eat a fairly normal diet if you wear dentures. Especially during the first few days of receiving new teeth, it is a good idea to eat a soft diet. This will allow the elimination of potential sore spots, with a minimum of discomfort, and will also make the learning period more tolerable. You should also avoid tough, hard, and sticky foods. Although some experienced denture wearers can eat a normal diet including apples, salads and corn on the cob, this is probably the exception rather than the rule. Most people who have dentures will find some restrictions in the foods they can manage.

Some points to remember regarding eating and chewing habits is to eat slowly and try to cut your food into smaller pieces. Extra chewing is required with dentures. In fact, it will usually take a denture wearer twice as long to chew food, as it would a person with natural teeth. Also, you should try to chew vertically (up and down) rather than horizontally (side to side). If you have to bite using your front teeth, try spreading your tongue against the back of the upper denture to keep it in place. Although the normal tendency is to chew on either one side or the other, denture wearers should try chewing food on both sides, over the back teeth, at the same time. This helps to prevent slipping of the denture.
