No silver lining for Xerox product

By Oksana Buhel
 A Georgetown resident was one-fifth responsible for the plummet in world prices of silver with the invention of a new, environmentally-friendly film which defies traditional methods of processing.

Arnold Pundsack worked with four other members of the Xerox Research Centre of Canada to develop VerdeFilm - a film which is processed with heat and light as opposed to conventional silver halide film - the processing of which utilizes chemicals and water.

The absence of chemicals in the new film threatens the existence of the silver halide film, used in an increasingly environmentally aware graphic arts industry.

This attribute of the film determined its name - "verde" translated from Italian is "green."

Specifically developed for magazines, newspapers and catalogues, VerdeFilm enables print media to reproduce multi-colored images during the color separation process.

Xerox Canada has been using a similar process in its high resolution micro graphics, Pundsack explained, but this is the first time such a process has been applied to film. The entire research process took approximately a year.

VerdeFilm is also credited by Xerox as having the ability to produce higher quality images and being easier to package and handle. The price of the film is competitive with silver halide film.

The only drawback the film has is its incompatibility with ordinary cameras. This drawback has enabled the price of silver to rebound.

The research team which helped develop VerdeFilm is currently working on an official June 1994 launch.
