Smog Advisory Program helps you take action

Beginning this spring, Canadians will receive smog advisories with their weather forecasts, on days when high air pollution levels are expected.

The smog advisory will ensure Canadians have the necessary information to protect the environment and their health.

The smog advisories will be issued in British Columbia, Ontario, the Montreal area and southern New Brunswick — the areas where high pollution levels occur most often. More than half of all Canadians live in areas where ground-level ozone may exceed acceptable levels during summer months.

Environment Canada, Health and Welfare Canada, the provinces, municipalities and other partners are working together to provide the information to Canadians through weather forecasts, the media, phone-in-lines, automated telephone answering devices and other mechanisms.

So what can you do?

When you hear a smog advisory there are some actions you can take to help.

- Leave your car at home
- Bike to work
- Use public transit
- Walk
- Carpool

Smog is a mixture of pollutants, with ground-level ozone as the main component. Use of fossil fuels in gasoline, diesel fuel, heavy fuel oil and natural gas contributes to the formation of ground-level ozone. We burn these fuels in our cars, trucks, construction engines, combustion turbines, industrial boilers, power plants and other facilities that use fossil fuel as an energy source.

On typical hot and hazy summer days, air that does not move around can trap pollutants over a large area, resulting in unacceptable levels of ground-level ozone. Anything you can do to reduce your contribution to smog will be beneficial to overall air quality.

The good news is — the success of the program will mean fewer smog advisories! So listen up for smog advisories from your local weather station — if you don't hear many — together, we're succeeding.
