Child support penalties 'on the mark': Arnott

Wellington MPP Ted Arnott has applauded the provincial government's efforts to impose tougher penalties on parents who are defaulting on their child support payments.

Under changes announced by the Attorney General on July 18, parents who refuse to meet their family support responsibilities will have their drivers' licences suspended.

"The Attorney General is right on the mark with this new policy," Arnott said recently. "Parents have a financial responsibility to care for their children and the government has to make sure parents are meeting their commitments. A marriage break-up is no excuse to abandon their parental obligations to their kids."

In discussions with the Attorney General last fall, Arnott had encouraged him to consider withholding drivers' licenses as a means of enforcing child support orders. Arnott also wrote to the Attorney General in early June, again encouraging tougher sanctions against dead-beat parents.

Arnott suggested parents who are in arrears might be persuaded to take this responsibility more seriously using these measures.

"It's unacceptable to walk away from your financial obligations to your children. There should be no public tolerance for anyone who is abandoning their responsibility as a parent. Too often this is happening in our communities today."
