The next morning, he seemed quite listless but at least he was alive. Our Christmas tree was up and he preferred lying underneath so I brought his food and drink to him. And I put a blanket on top of him in case he got chilled.

When my husband returned, I suggested Domino go back to the vets' to ensure he was on the upswing. At that point, I was too emotional and sleep deprived to recognize he had, in fact, been improving.

It was confirmed Domino was healing nicely and there was nothing to be worried about. He was just taking a little longer to feel perky. Whew!

So I've surprised myself, I guess. With two children, I thought I was all loved-out. As busy as I was in a full-time job, running a house and taking care of daughters, I still could muster up a little more caring for an adoptee.

Every morning, Domino greets me with one thing on his mind: food. He practically knocks me over getting to his dish and chases me as I groggily stagger to the cupboard where his bag of food is kept. Once it's poured and his water dish is replenished, I figure I can safely go about my regular morning chores but what's this?

Without fail, he follows me wherever I walk to, meowing all the way, insisting on our morning chat and cuddle. Then, and only then, is he content enough to actually eat his breakfast.

I am a chump... but I guess that's okay because I did say I liked cats, didn't I?
