tech talk with BRYAN & DAN

Can my plugs really go 100,000 km?

QUESTION: I drive a 1994 Ford Explorer with a 4.0 litre engine. The owner's manual says the spark plugs are platinum tipped and can drive 100,000 km before they need replacing. Is this true?

ANSWER: Chances are very good that the spark plugs won't go 100,000 km without failure.

One reason for this is a chemical called M.M.T. is used in Canadian fuels, which tends to slowly contaminate the plugs.

Also, in most cases, it takes an average car owner 4 to 5 years to drive 100,000 km. This means that your vehicle has gone through 4 winters of road salt and rust buildup.

When plug replacement time finally arrives, it's too late. The body of the spark plug has both corroded and become too thin to remove or it has rusted to the cylinder head. Both cases result in the plug breaking off in the cylinder head.

Early replacement would cost about $9 each for plugs and between $70-100 in labour.

A seized or broken spark plug would require cylinder head removal and machine shop service, which could cost upwards of $800.
