Water program for Georgetown

Students working with Halton Region's Water Efficiency program are calling on Georgetown residents, providing them with water conservation tools and advice. They visit Georgetown neighbourhoods and telephone residents, providing information on how to maintain a beautiful healthy lawn and garden simply by using water efficiently.

The program began in early June and runs until Labour Day weekend.

The water efficiency program is based on pilot programs Halton Region had conducted in previous years. These pilot programs achieved reductions of between 54 and 220 litres per household per high irrigation day. It is hoped similar results will be achieved on a community-wide scale in this year's program in Georgetown.

"Response from the community has been very positive so far," said Cassandra Bach, Water Efficiency Coordinator for Halton Region. "We are not asking people to stop using water- just use it wisely."

Residents receive Halton's Household Guide to Water Efficiency, which has information on how to save water in the home and outside in the yard. It has everything from tips on how to fix a leaky toilet to lists of water efficient plants. More than 20,000 guides have been distributed in Halton so far, 5,000 in Georgetown.

Households visited by students also receive hose washers to fix leaky hoses and rain gauges to monitor the amount of rainfall their lawns receive. A simple tuna can will work just as well. Most lawns only require one inch or 2.5 cm of water a week to stay healthy.
