Outside the council chambers, Hurst said he was looking forward to his new career.

“I’m looking forward to people coming to me with their problems and issues and my being able to direct them to the person that can help them, or by helping them myself,” Hurst said, as he posed beside a photo of the 1974-77 inaugural Halton Hills council than included his father, former Acton clerk and councillor, Joe Hurst.

Tackling a possible double-digit budget increase is job one for Acton local councillor elect Mike O’Leary.

“Part of my mandate from the people of Acton is to be fiscally responsible,” O’Leary said from his home early Tuesday morning, adding one tough part of his new job will be to deal with the bureaucracy at the Civic Centre.

“I’ll just have to have some patience and work my way through it,” O’Leary said, adding he will “lean on” mayor elect Rob Bonnette and Councillor Somerville for guidance.

For the Regional wards Three and Four seat, incumbent local Councillor Jane Fogal trounced Stephen Grasby – 5,388 votes to 1,796, and in Ward Four, incumbents Ron Chatten and Bob Inglis easily defeated challenger Derrick Williams.

Halton chairman Joyce Savoline coasted to another term, handily defeating three challengers, including former Halton Hills politician Rob Heaton who ran a distant second.

Ward One and Two regional candidate Drew Riedstra, making his first try for municipal office, told The New Tanner he found the process “enjoyable and informative”. “I wish the new council all the best in the next term and hope they will provide progressive leadership.” Riedstra is undecided about running again. “I’m thinking it over” he said.
