Adema said she gets much more from the day than she gives.

"Everyone felt good about it last year – the guests, volunteers and everyone that brought food. It made the day so much better because it was so much better for a lot of people."

Adema said this year, her daughter, mom and dad, brother and his wife and kids all plan to help out, and some volunteers also bring their children to show them that it's "not all about gifts – it's more about sharing and a different way to celebrate."

Volunteer Heather Crider said the community has been so generous that along with a complete turkey dinner – most of it donated – they have gift bags for everyone who attends.

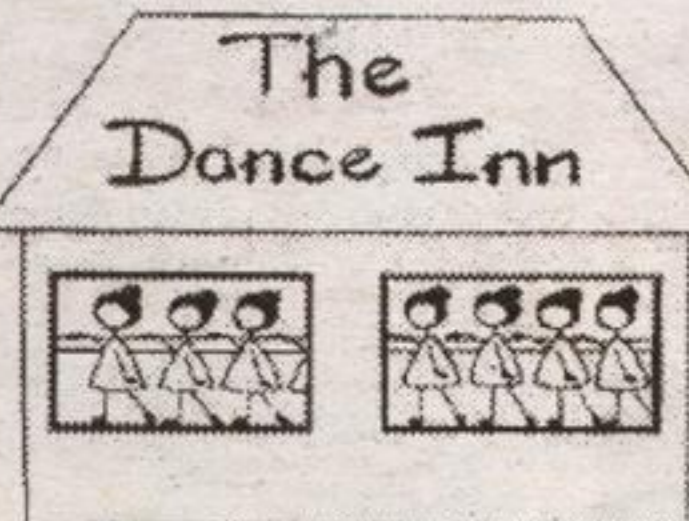

She said she and her husband became involved because they wanted to help make Christmas nicer for someone.

"I always wanted to do something, but didn't know what. When I went into the Salvation Army to ask if they needed help, they gave me the information about this group and we volunteered," Crider said last Thursday.

Transportation to the meal is available, and although no one will be turned away, organizers would like those planning to attend to call 853-3487, so they know how many to expect.

BLAZE OF LIGHTS: The entire New Tanner circulation area is a blaze with Christmas lights, some spectacular, some modest, some even in poor taste but they all add up to good cheer for our merriest and happy season. - Danielle McIsaac photo.
