Proposed gun control legislation Experts to debate here

Georgetown's public meeting on the proposed gun control legislation Thursday night promises to give equal representation to both sides of the issue, according to the two organizers.

A panel of six people is made up of three from each side, said Georgetown resident Dave Eagleson. He said people are flying in from as far away as B.C. to speak.

"The intent is to provide good, clear, concise information concerning an issue that is quite volatile. I don't believe the issues are fully understood by the public," Eagleson said.

Eagleson and Art Hawes are firearms safety instructors and teach about one 12 to 16-hour course each month in Georgetown privately. The course became mandatory January 1, 1994 for people applying to own guns.

The proposed new legislation, which hasn't been made public yet, is on the front burner to be discussed after Parliament goes back into session on Monday, Feb. 6.

Hawes, who is setting up a fishing tackle business, said his interest in the issue came about as a result of being a firearms instructor. He said the legislation is "a major intrusion into the rights of gun owners" who can have their weapons confiscated without compensation. The legislation would also give government access to medical records of gun owners, to find out if he might, for example, suffer from depression.

Eagleson's interest results from developing a property near Algonquin Park, where hunting is a way of life.

He said the legislation also deals with stiff penalties for people who commit crimes using firearms, but he believes the law already provides for stiff penalties, only these aren't meted out by the justice system.

Eagleson said he doesn't know who will be attending the meeting, but there will be several members of different organizations there prepared to answer questions. MP Julian Reed will speak at the meeting; he is generally in favor, with reservations, of the legislation.

Eagleson said the meeting, 7 p.m. at GDHS, is expected to cost under $1,000, and he and Hawes will ask for donations. Any excess money will be donated to the families of murder victims, Leslie Mahaffy and Kristin French.
