Work That Body hosts murder mystery night

While fitness clubs usually test physical fitness, Work That Body had people doing mental exercises.

The club hosted a murder mystery on Saturday night to celebrate its grand reopening. Club members and associates of owner Laurie Burns were taken hostage by terrorists and were held captive until the murder of El Findendo, the terrorist group's leaders, was solved.

Donna, the English fashion designer and part-time terrorist, was eventually exposed as the culprit but while the mystery was being unraveled the "hostages" had a chance to tour the newly renovated facilities at Work That Body.

The club, which opened 12 years ago, recently expanded to 13,000 square feet, about double its previous size. Included in the renovations were a new aerobic wood sprung floor, a larger weight room and the addition of treadmills and rowing machines.

"It's pretty exciting," said Burns of the renovations. "It's nice to know we are able to grow and keep providing better services."

Work That Body, which now has a membership of 850, took about six weeks to complete the improvements. Besides upgrading the aerobics and weight lifting area, the club also expanded its facilities for kids, adding a pirate ship and ball pool.

Burns said the club is also unique because of the variety of services it does provide.

"We do a lot of rehabilitation," she said. "It's good for the community to have that service because without it they would have to go out of town for it."
