Pomeroy tells his side

The property was later sold for $11 million, following an Official Plan amendment which included it within the urban boundaries of Georgetown, guaranteeing it municipal services.

As mayor of Halton Hills, Pomeroy voted for that amendment and did not declare a conflict of interest.

Wearing a navy blue suit, Pomeroy took the witness stand in his own defence, to tell the court he had never owned shares in Albefins, or held an investment in the orchard property.

He also told the court he believes politicians have an obligation to be open about their affairs.

"One of the responsibilities of elected people, and one of the public expectations, is that their lives be an open book," Pomeroy testified.

Pomeroy also testified that the Official Plan amendment, which included the Georgetown property within the town's urban boundaries, also designated it as major open space containing environmentally sensitive areas.

"It puts some huge obstacles in the road if it was ever to be developed," he said. The longtime Halton politician testified he had met Arnold about 25 years ago. As well as seeing each other socially on occasion, Pomeroy said he regularly saw Arnold when he attended town council and committee meetings on business.

"It's quite a coincidence, isn't it, that of all the people Mr. Arnold could have chosen to use in efforts to keep assets from his wife, he chose you. Quite a coincidence," noted assistant Crown attorney Brian Gover, during cross-examination.

Pomeroy's testimony that Arnold had used his name in an attempt to hide property from his wife was not challenged by Arnold's defence lawyer Peter Osborne. Arnold will not be taking the witness stand.

The case, being heard by Mr. Justice James Clarke, concluded with closing arguments Friday.

Correction: It was reported in the Wednesday edition that Karen Thompson, who testified on Pomeroy's behalf, was a member of the Halton Police Services Board. She is, in fact, a former member.

"I anticipate we will have more people wearing red noses Monday than last year," said Carpenter.

"I would love to see Georgetown go for the inside record (of a lineup of red noses) in the mall. There are enough people in Georgetown who have a sense of humor."

Carpenter said other communities have plans to Lighten Up.

He said the City of Hamilton has plans to celebrate for a week and Grand Bend is planning a Lighten Up Carnival.

He added Kitchener Waterloo will also be participating in red nose festivities.
