

Hospital wants integrated health care approach

Georgetown & District Memorial Hospital's proposal submitted to the Health Services Restructuring Commission calls for an integrated health care approach for Halton Hills.

The commission, which recently recommended the closure of several Toronto hospitals, is attempting to co-ordinate and integrate health services in the province.

Among the hospital's recommendations to the commission were that Georgetown hospital, in co-operation with the community, should pursue the development of a health campus offering acute care, long-term care, supportive housing, retirement housing and professional social services within a wooded, recreational setting.

The hospital also recommended it continue to provide 24-hour emergency care, low-risk birthing and newborn care, general and gynecological surgery and in-patient beds sufficient to support acute care in medicine and surgery.

Continuing to develop clinical alliances with Peel hospitals for tertiary services was also recommended. Other recommendations included that the community participate in a pilot project for the development of an integrated health delivery and funding system and that the hospital supports preserving the role of the local volunteer hospital board.

Georgetown Hospital is expecting to receive an interim report from the commission in four to six weeks.
