

Keep your car's service records handy

When you visit your family doctor the first thing they do is search through your records for previous symptoms and/or treatments that may be relevant.

Taking your ailing car to its regular repair shop or car dealer may produce the same procedure: a look at the records. This information can save time and money.

But what if you have car trouble on the road? If a mechanic far from home asks you when you last had the cooling system serviced, for example, or spark plugs changed, would you have that information? The Car Care Council suggests keeping a condensed version of your vehicle's service records in a little glove compartment notebook.

Having a complete maintenance history on hand can give you real peace of mind when dealing with someone who doesn't know you or your car. It could dissuade him from selling services or repairs you don't need.

Your notebook has another benefit: it enhances the value of your car when selling or trading. The Car Care Council says a well maintained vehicle can be worth two-three times as much as the identical one that's been neglected, and nothing says conscientious care better than good records.

Just as your family doctor will recommend a periodic physical as a preventive health measure, motorists should do the same with their vehicles.
