

Striking out fire

Patrols increased

Police on high alert, says chief

In the wake of the events of September 11 Halton Regional Police are on high alert.

Halton Regional Police Chief Ean Algar said the safety of Halton communities and citizens remains paramount. Halton Police and its many partners are working together to maintain Halton Region's reputation as the safest community with a population in excess of 100,000.

Halton officers have increased their patrols and have taken other initiatives designed to make Halton safe. Police also remain in close contact with neighbouring police agencies to share information.

"I am pleased with the willingness of municipal officials to work together to reinforce the safety of the communities," said Algar.

The Halton Police Service has had a series of meetings with religious and community leaders to understand their concerns and ensure them of the service's commitment to safety.

Algar emphasizes as citizens of Halton, everyone has a responsibility to ensure the community is safe. Anyone with information regarding a suspicious incident or crime is asked to report it to police immediately.
