Tip for Teens – Teens and credit cards

by Barbara Burrows

Parents sometimes find it very convenient to allow teens to use parents' credit cards (phoning long distance, buying back to school clothes and supplies). It is important to realize that having possession of the parents' card can stir up some very real desires to "get" more from the parents than the parent intended to give. As teenagers are struggling to take less from parents emotionally, their desires to take more material possessions can increase.

Very clear rules around the use of credit cards can help teens behave responsibly. One family gave the teenagers their own cards for the parents' account, with the following written stipulation. The cards were to be used with only with parental permission unless the teen had cash at home to cover cost of purchase and could pay for item immediately upon returning home.

When the temptation to "take" from the parents presented itself, and the son put a nominal food purchase on the card (under $10.00) without back-up funds or permission, a new clause had to be added to the original written agreement.

The son was required to place his Visa card and Visa slip in an envelope until such time as he could repay his $7.95 bill. The son willingly complied, and was allowed to have access to the card when his bill was paid.
