through with a hit if they see the 'Stop' sign players wear on the back of their sweaters.

"I'm very close to this issue," said Roberts, whose career was threatened by a neck injury in 1995. "Hockey is a contact sport so it's essential for these young players to learn proper checking techniques to ensure that hockey remains fun and safe."

"As a coach, you sometimes wonder if these guys listen," Kessel said of his 10-year-olds, "but you could have heard a pin drop when Gary was speaking."

Roberts gave the Raiders a tour of the Leafs dressing room, a replica of their room at the Air Canada Centre, and answered players' questions.

The practice was arranged through the Ontario Minor Hockey Association's development program. The OMHA's Dennis Norton was put in charge of finding a team and looked to his hometown.

Tyler Nieuwendyk of the Georgetown Major Atom Raiders participates in a drill with the Toronto Maple Leafs' Gary Roberts.

"It was a pretty incredible experience," Kessel said. "We could lose every game for the rest of the year and I think everyone would still be satisfied with their year. The kids felt 10 feet tall after the practice."
