Hip hopping at the high school

Kristina Fallico led students at Georgetown District High School in a Hip Hop Dance as part of the Active High Schools program, which was launched at GDHS and will be included at the other high schools in town. Students determine program needs and take a leadership role promoting and leading the after-school physical activity program in their high school. The program, led by the Town of Halton Hills' Recreation and Park Department, is made possible by a $23,550 Active 2010 grant from the Ontario government to get residents of Halton Hills fit. Active 2010 is the Province's new strategy to increase physical activity and sport participation throughout Ontario so that by the year 2010, 55 percent of Ontarians are physically active. "We know there are barriers to physical activity. Time, money, and location are all factors that contribute to physical inactivity," said Terry Alyman, Director of Halton Hills Recreation and Parks Department. "We want to make it easier for our community to get active. We want to help remove those barriers. The physical, emotional and social benefits of physical activity are worth it." More details of Active Halton Hills will be released in the months ahead.
