Q: Can I use a CDFA™ instead of a lawyer?

A: No. The CDFA™ is not a substitute for a lawyer. The Certified Divorce Financial Analyst™ will not offer any legal advice. Even if you and your spouse are able to agree to a divorce settlement via mediation or on your own we recommend that you see a divorce lawyer in order to look over the legal issues that are associated with all divorce cases.

The question answers itself if you reverse it: Why do you need a divorce lawyer if you already have a divorce financial planner? Answer: Because financial planners are not experts in the law and lawyers are not experts in financial planning.

Our role is to provide you and your lawyer with the best possible information about your financial needs – now and in the future – so that your lawyer can negotiate the best possible settlement for you.

Q: My parents are considering a move to a retirement home. If and when they move, are there restrictions that I should know about? For example, can I visit or phone any time?

A: Retirement homes cater to independent, relatively healthy seniors who want to enjoy a more carefree, enriched lifestyle. Think of your parents as living in a hotel-like environment. You can visit or phone as you, (or your parents), please. Your parents determine the restrictions as to times.

Some retirement homes lock their doors in the evening for security purposes only. Using an intercom system, residents and visitors may still come and go at their leisure.

Just as they have always done, your parents can entertain as they would in their own home and can even invite friends to join them in the dining room for meals.

Again, think of this as a move into a hotel setting, with the freedoms they have always enjoyed.

Q: I was playing soccer when another player knocked into me. As a result, my body twisted to the right, while my right foot remained planted. I felt immediate pain to the inside of my right knee, as well as, hearing a "clunk". There was swelling and occasionally I felt my knee lock. My doctor has told me that I probably have a tear to my 'medial meniscus'. What is this?

A: The medial and lateral menisci are crescent-shaped pieces of fibrocartilage that lie on the top portion of the shin bone (tibia), where the tibia articulates with the thigh bone (femur). They act like shock absorbers and allow for a congruency between the two ones ("fill in the gap"). Frequently, a twisting injury such as yours, will cause injury to the medial meniscus (the one closer to the inside of the knee). Depending on the extent of injury, this may result in anything from a mild sprain to a tear of the meniscus. If the portion torn becomes dislodged, it can get caught between the tibia and femur. This can cause the "locking" that you are experiencing.

Tears along the outside edge of the meniscus usually heal well because there is a fairly good blood supply to these areas. However, tears toward the inside of the meniscus are poorly supplied by the blood, subsequently resulting in poor healing. Depending on how disabling your injury is, you may require surgery. An Orthopedic surgeon will ultimately make that decision. Regardless, you will need to keep your knee and entire lower extremity, strong. A physiotherapist can advise you regarding the correct exercises. If you do undergo surgery, be sure to see a physiotherapist afterwards in order to help you quickly regain your range of motion and function.
