More volunteers needed for GBA

of the board of directors, which is composed of parents with children playing at the rep levels, representing about 130 players.

As well, questions surrounded the increase of $21,761 in registration revenue in the 2007 GBA budget from the previous year that was left unexplained during the October AGM due to the absence of the former treasurer, Pam Owens, who was unable to attend that evening due to work commitments. Peddie could not account for the revenue increase at the AGM, yet the budget was still voted on and approved.

At last week's meeting, Owens explained that most of that extra revenue was actually an allowance for the GBA's rep players, who paid an additional $115 in registration that could be spent on uniforms or equipment at the Sports Unlimited store location in Georgetown. Only one parent requested a full refund for the uniform allowance and the GBA's year-end report listed a surplus of $7,677 for its 2007 financial standing.

Some executive members were upset that they've had their reputations damaged because of the allegations and are worried that the association's annual sponsorship drive may also suffer, perhaps resulting in an increase in registration fees.

"You can see the dilemma we have," Byckowski added, noting that executive members and their families also coached and umpired through the season.

"This is not rep versus house league thing. It's a house league problem and we're doing the best we can with the few people that we have. There are 800 possible volunteers for the house league and we did get some support from them last year, but more is needed."

Ian Stubberfield, the GBA's director of operations, said that once leadership positions in the house league are established, it will be possible in the coming months to delegate some of the tasks involved to new volunteers.
