

New Georgetown school named after Ethel Gardiner

Halton District School Board trustees select Gardiner Public School as the name for the new elementary school currently under construction in south Georgetown Wednesday.

The name for the new school was selected from a short list of names gathered in suggestion boxes throughout Halton Hills.

Ethel Gardiner was a former Halton District School Board trustee for Halton Hills, serving from 1995-2006.

She was also elected chair of the board for six consecutive terms and her teaching and educational career included roles as a classroom and special education teacher, teaching principal, trustee and chair.

"Ethel Gardiner's career with this Board spanned 40 years, and was almost entirely dedicated to the Halton Hills community," said Wayne Joudrie, Director of Education for the Halton District School Board.

"Her commitment to education in Halton continued after retirement when she served as public school board trustee and Chair."

Gardiner's nomination was supported by many Georgetown residents, school councils, former students, and education colleagues.

"The naming of a school after a person is a great honour," adds Joudrie.

"We had a number of excellent individuals whose names were submitted for this honour, however, trustees felt Ethel Gardiner's life-long commitment to education in Halton was deserving at this time. In the next few years we will be building more schools and we hope the Halton community will continue to nominate such excellent and deserving people for this recognition."

Halton Hills Wards 3 and 4 Trustee and HDSB chair Gillian Tuck Kutarna, who sat on the naming committee, said, "The board was grateful to everyone who contributed a suggestion."

"The naming committee gave consideration to all the suggestions that had been proposed by the community, but by far the greatest number of ballots were cast for naming the school after Ms. Gardiner. I was pleased to put forth the voice of the community at the board table."
