

Brad Osborne (centre) is surrounded by a group of Christ the King students who came to his defence Thursday after school officials barred him from attending tonight's prom. Osborne is currently attending Georgetown District High School after being expelled from Christ the King two years ago.

Students at CtK stage protest

The group of protesters said they've also now been told by school administration that they won't be admitted to the prom. They had collected a petition signed by about 200 people and had also turned to Facebook to publicize their plight.

"Now they're trying to kick other people out for talking about it and I don't think they should be able to do that," Osborne continued. "It's a Catholic school and it's in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms that you can have a peaceful assembly. We're not doing anything wrong out here."

Both Harris and CtK principal Dave DeSantis declined to comment on the situation, and said the Halton District Catholic School Board would likely not discuss the issue either, citing the Municipal Privacy Act.
