DaSilva inquest jury makes safety recommendations

A jury made several safety recommendations following a coroner's inquest last week into the death of Tim DaSilva, the 20-year-old Milton man who died when he was crushed by a roller he was operating while building a BMX bike track at Halton Place in 2006.

Following the two-day inquest held in Milton, the coroner's jury recommended the Ministry of Labour (MOL) consider a regulation requiring all ride-on construction machinery have an active restraint lap bar, as well as a seatbelt that can't be bypassed, and prevents operation of the equipment unless engaged.

The jury also recommended the MOL consider a regulation requiring all ride-on-roller devices have a passive containment system that would keep the operator within the Roll Over Protection

System (ROPS) if there were a rollover.

It also recommended the MOL consider requiring a spotter when a ride-on roller is used on surfaces that exceed a specific gradient or slope.

The final recommendation made was that the MOL consider a regulation requiring an employer keep appropriate records of safety training and safety advisories given to employees. The records would include an employee's signature acknowledging completion of hands-on training and demonstrated competency of the equipment being used.

The recommendations are not mandatory but are forwarded to the MOL said a spokesperson for the Office of the Chief Coroner. She said the MOL has a year to respond.
