Region eyes putting GreenCarts in schools

The Region is looking to get its GreenCart program into all Halton elementary schools.

The initiative—which aims to build on the success of the residential curbside GreenCart program and instill environmentally-friendly habits in local kids—was supported by the Region's planning and public works committee last Wednesday.

If approved by regional council today (Wednesday), the plan is to gradually implement the GreenCart program in Halton's schools. Blue Boxes have been in Halton schools since 2003.

Six elementary schools in the region took part in a GreenCart pilot project and will continue using the bins, while another eight have already expressed interest in taking part, staff reported to the committee.

Halton Hills Mayor Rick Bonnette voiced his support for the school program and asked if any thought has been given to getting GreenCarts into municipal buildings.

Halton CAO Pat Moyle said GreenCarts are already available in the Halton Regional Centre and the Region's offices on Dorval Drive. He also said the Region should speak to the local municipalities to make sure the program is available to them as well.

It's estimated that about 1,000 GreenCarts and 1,500 Kitchen Catcher bins will be needed to service all of the elementary schools in the publicly-funded school system. The containers would cost about $18,000 and be accommodated in the Region's budget.

The annual cost to collect Blue Boxes and GreenCart material from elementary schools is estimated at $52,000. It's also expected to cost $12,000 to process and transfer the materials. Both figures were incorporated in the approved 2008 budget.

The committee discussed whether the Region should have an agreement with the school boards to recover costs.

Oakville Councillor Tom Adams said he doesn't want money to become a stumbling block for the school program while Burlington Councillor John Taylor said it's something that can be discussed and negotiated.

Goodbye 2008s.

Take the squirrels with you.
