

Library seeks public comment on design plans

CYNTHIA GAMBLE
Staff Writer

Despite its disappointment over the delay on the construction of the new Georgetown branch library, the Halton Hills Public Library Board is continuing to seek public comment on its proposed design.

"The Library Board will use the extra time to continue to work with stakeholders to resolve design challenges, upgrade existing furniture and equipment destined for the new branch and explore options for a temporary location during the construction phase," according to a statement released last week.

Residents are being encouraged to share their questions and concerns with Jay Jackson, chair of the board, by dropping off letters at the both branches of the library or by e-mailing Library Director Jane Diamanti at diamantij@hhpl.on.ca

Concerned about the lack of a timeframe attached to the council hold on the project, the Board will seek clarification with the Town so they can begin planning around either a short or long-term deferral.

"The Library Board also intends to review the implications for the project should the delay exceed one year, including a potential escalation of costs," the statement said.

"The Library Board is concerned that the Georgetown branch cannot continue to serve this community effectively without the much needed space. Given widely used guidelines for public libraries and the current population of the Georgetown branch service area, the building should be more than twice the size."

The Town and Board are waiting on the tenders for the two Georgetown fire stations, and as well as Ministry of Environment decisions on water capacity improvement projects in Halton Hills, before a final decision is made on the library expansion project. In the meantime, depending on the results of the fire station tenders, the Town may extend some money to the Board for some immediate short-term improvements. The fire station tender results won't be known until sometime this fall.
