Hip hop show is designed to encourage science careers

An award-winning hip hop science education concert is coming to Georgetown District High School on Thursday, October 11.

The demand for technical people is growing three times faster than all other occupations, while enrolment in science, math and engineering courses continues to decline.

To address this "crisis", NASA (United States National Aeronautical Space Agency) and Honeywell have developed FMA Live!, an education program that uses live performers, music, videos and interactive scientific demonstrations to teach students about Newton's Laws of Motion and the Universal Law of Gravity. These topics have been identified by the American National Science Education Standards as key learning objectives for students in Grades 5-8.

Named for Sir Isaac Newton's Second Law (Force = Mass x Acceleration), FMA Live! is designed to inspire students to pursue careers in science, technology, engineering and math.

Interactive science demos include a Velcro wall, hover chair, "extreme" wrestling, dragster cars and rocket launchers. Other show highlights include original music and dance moves by professional actors and music videos and rockumentary about the life and work of Sir Isaac Newton.

Centennial Middle School students will also be attending one of the two 45-minute morning shows.

Honeywell funds the entire cost of the performances. For details, go to www.honeywell.com
