Dorbeck

said the centre will offer a complete range of self-directed job search resources.

"People will be able to work on their resumes, they will be able to attend workshops and seminars on interview skills, resume preparation and job search techniques, and we'll also hold special workshops for teens for the Christmas shopping season and summer," Dorbeck said, adding they also have apprenticeship and trade program information.

One-on-one help will be available to critique resumes and interview skills and for career counselling.

They expect to see 750 clients – 165 in the first six months – during the two-year contract, with many repeat clients.

"Finding a job is a process, not an event. You cast a line," Dorbeck said, adding that along with all of the latest job search resources, the staff are the right ones for the job.

"We've all been unemployed and know what it feels like – for most of us, it was not good, although some see unemployment as a challenge and have a fantastic attitude. We want to make this a warm and welcoming place where people can get the support they need."

Dorbeck said the six computers at the Centre are huge tools in the search for a job.

"You can research any career and there are web sites that actually forecast the need for that career, including salaries and related occupations. That is a great help, along with on-line suitability and skills assessments that people can do to find their strengths and areas of interest," Dorbeck said.

Dorbeck said in the coming weeks she'll visit local businesses to find out what they need and work with the schools.
