Money to brand

Members of the Greater Toronto Countryside Mayors' Alliance – the “little guys” in Southern Ontario according to Halton Hills Mayor Rick Bonnette, will receive an economic shot in the arm from the province.

At an Alliance meeting on Friday, members agreed to match the province's offer of $25,000 for a study involving the area's economic development officers to “work on strategies for this area.”

Town Digest

“The province is at the table – this is a good thing,” Bonnette said, adding it will take a month to develop terms of reference for the marketing/promotion study that will look for opportunities for “branding” Alliance members, some like Acton where growth and development are constrained because of provincial Greenbelt legislation.

Ward four race

There will be at least one race for a seat on Halton Hills council in the October municipal election. Ross McDuff is challenging incumbent Georgetown Councillors Bob Inglis and John Duncan for one of the two local Ward four seats on council.

So far, McDuff is the only candidate to challenge an incumbent, all of whom have filed their nomination papers.
