AR. MOONEY of Mooseville stood In the door of his cable in the woods which covered the side of Mooseville mountain, peering nearsightedly at a folded copy of a newspaper which he held in a leathery-LOST: Big tan dog resembling hound.

Name: Floppy-ear. Reward: $19.00. P.O. Box 191 Mooseville His steps made alightly uncertain by years and rheumatism, Mr. Mooney limped across the cabin, and opened the door into the woodshed.

"Come .'erc. Floppy-ear!" The big tan dog ambled toward him, Mr. Mooney regarded her speculatively. "Now if those people that put that air notice in the paper sees my sign I stuck up in the post office. I guess likely your folks'll be right along, ma'ant. - Some o' those summer folks, up to the lake most likely. Don't know no better'n to go wanderin' all over the maounting."

At the sound of a car laboring noislly up the steep hill, he closed the woodshed door upon the dog, and hobbled outside. The car was an old one was a fair-haired slim girl, with blue eyes to match her sweater and beret. out past the thick trees clustered around the edge of the clearing, and the cabin.

Mooney gave a violent start. There at his side was a tall, good-looking youth with dark hair. "I came to claim my dog, sir. You have her here. I think-in the shed. perhaps?" With three long strides. he was past the astonished Mr. Mooney and had opened the door of the shed. The dog came bounding out to him, jumping at his legs, exhibiting every sign of joy and recognition. "Here," smiled the young man.

"Here is the reward! Thank you, sir!" He thrust into the left hand of Mr. Mooney a neatly folded ten dollar bill. "Come, Floppy-cart" he called, and started across the field. Before he had gone two steps the girl was facing him, her eyes flashing. Without speaking to him, she turned scornfully away. "Come, Floppy-ear!" she called. And the dog came running to her, jumping, barking, with joy. Mr. Mooney, because he was nearsighted, had to move nearer to them in order to puzzle it out. He had to move nearer still, because we was a little hard of hearing. But neither of them noticed him at all. "You don't want that dog," the man was saying in an even, firm voice, that somehow held a note of bitterness. "Come here, Floppy-enr." The dog
