COLOR IN PARTY MENUS Barbara B. Brooks

Whether we are conscious of it or not, we all respond to the influence of color. Psychologists have written learned books about the effect of color on personality tion of our reactions to particular colors. There is no doubt that the color of loods in menus has much to do with our injoyment of mosts. Good use of color eating a horror. Of course; color is always important because we see our food before we eat it In party menus color very often makes the festiveness of the occasion. We feel that such occasions are worth the extra thought and time it takes to match and conrast foods to make a meal attractive to the eye and still have it properly balanced and good to eat.

Civilization seems to have been a process of toning down the bright colors we loved as savages and as young children. When we consciously try to put color into a menu, our first precaution is to check the primitive urge to go too far in making up a color scheme. 'After all, we want the food we cat to look natural. Emerald green potatoes or pink bread may be interesting as a spectacle, but we are not so enthusiastic about eating them. Such extremes are unnecessary anyway. If we want a green menu for St. Patrick's Day, there are all the green vegetables to help us out. If our theme is pink or red, there are many foods to choose. Water the reds though for clashing shades The reds of tomatoes and beets should not appear in full strength on the table at the same time. Yellow is one of our best food colors. It is easy to put into the menu and most yellows blend wall On the other hand, blue is difficult and is best supplied in table decorationsflowers, candles, cloth or dishes. Food should be chosen to set off the blue accessories. Yellows and oranges, green or touches of red worked tato the menu will give a charming and colorful effect. Whatever our picture is to be, there must be a background for balance. The golden browns of hot breads, toasted crackers, takes and pastry are not to be looked upon as flaws in an otherwise perfect scheme. These foods are the balancers and
